HULING SAYAW

Just a quick highlight of what i did.

The self.

1. Self-learning
2. Challenges
3. My thoughts
4. Results?

I was honestly surprised to lead a large dance group for tae-bo and sub-leading in cha-cha-me, someone who's not even good at dancing. It felt very unreal at first, but there I was, teaching choreography and organizing formations. It was intimidating, but it taught me so much about preparing more to teamwork and patience. Breaking down steps, adjusting when things didn't work, and managing formations felt like solving a big puzzle. In the end, it was a challenging but experience.

Despite the challenges,

somewhat, we made it work. There were moments when it felt like everything was falling apart—people missing practice, choreography not syncing, or energy running low. Still, with the remaining group members we kept going, little by little, it all started coming together. Watching our members try to follow along, seeing the moves click, and feeling the rhythm of the cha-cha gave me a sense of accomplishment as a person not really able to dance well or passionate in it. Looking back, all the busy evenings, the frustration, and the endless adjustments were still worth it. The performance wasn't just about dancing—it became an insight of growth. It reminded me that the hardships often lead to the rewarding things as well.

My thoughts.

We still wanted to include the other members in the group even if others were inactive. We were given a chance to remove non-cooperative group mates, but we chose not to. Instead, we tried our best to involve them, hoping they would reconnect with the group and contribute in their own way. It wasn't easy—sometimes it felt like dragging a ton of things—but we believed in giving everyone a chance. When some of them eventually showed up and gave their effort, it reminded us why we made that choice. This performance wasn't just about the end result; it was about learning how to work as a team, even when things weren't perfect.

The Result.

We gave our best shot, although it wasn't perfect. I'm satisfied. A huge margin more to improve myself in leading and in dancing, but I'm proud of what we achieved as a team. This experience opened my eyes to what I'm capable of, even if I doubted myself at first. It showed me that growth doesn't come from perfection—it comes from trying, learning, and pushing through challenges. There's still so much for me to learn, but this journey was a solid first step. I'm excited to take what I've learned and apply it to whatever comes next.
